CAPSULE LEWIS ROBERTS HOUSE (SITE) AND DAIRY

The 1850's maps which exist for this area show "Lewis Roberts" on this site. The Robert's house is survived only by a photograph and one of its dependencies. It was replaced by a handsome Georgian Revival house in 1911. The early 20th century photograph taken of the house prior to its demolition is a snapshot taken at some distance. It shows a Mansard roof building which probably had stone walls. The popularity of the Mansard after 1860 and the presence of the Roberts on this land since the 1820's suggest that an earlier building was Victorianized.

Although there is archaeoligical value to this property the only pre-modern physical evidence is a stone dairy and an ice pond. The pond is man-made but of uncertain date; the dairy is at least as old as the Mansard building in the photograph. The 13 foot by 14 foot gable roofed structure is situated on a spring fed stream and was used for the cooling of dairy products produced on the farm. Its tapered vertical slit vents give it an early appearance. With "delivered" milk having already become obsolete this little building is instructive of an even earlier means of food production.

In 1896 it was part of a complex which included a dwelling, stable, hen house and ice house as well. The Roberts dairy dates from a time when the Towson area was part of rural America and a very young United States.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

One of the sites appearing on the 1852 Chiffele map of the Towson area is that of "Lewis Roberts" being only a short distance to the Southeast from the intersection of Joppa Road and "Powder Mill Road." The L. J. Roberts estate is indicated clearly on the Hopkins Atlas of 1877 and is called "Walnut Hill." The main house was destroyed in 1911 and replaced with the fine Colonial Revival structure which stands today. The original farm is survived by an early spring house, ice pond, at least two archaeological sites and a photograph of the old house.

Mrs. James Owings, whose maiden name was Carey, was born at Walnut Hill in the old house and still lives here today in the house her father built in 1911. She is a valuable source of information. Her father, George Gibson Carey, acquired this property in 1903. Mrs. Owings recalls that the family once found a "Roberts" tombstone beneath the porch of the old house which was later discarded "in the old berry patch near the barn" (Southeast of the house). The decision was made to tear down the old house and buildithe new one after she had lived in the old house as a child. Her father hired George Morris to build the fine home that is there today. According to Mrs. Owings the 1911 house was situated slightly further North than the old one so that the foundation of the present south wall might incorporate that of the old north wall. Examination of the cellar shows no definite pre-modern materials. Mrs. Owings is certain that the stone spring house at the bottom of the hill East of the house is a survivor of the earlier farm as is the nearby ice pond. A snapshot with the old house in the background and the Hopkins Atlas of 1877 give some idea of what the farm looked like one hundred years ago. In the picture one can see a blurred light colored building with a Mansard roof.

Mrs. Owings seemed certain that she had heard that the Roberts did not build the original house but that they had acquired it from an earlier owner, possibly the Coles. This suggestion and the appearance of Lewis Roberts on the 1852 map leads one to suppose that the Mansard roofed structure in the photo is an older building which had been Victorianized in the 1860's or 1870's. The house was perched high on a hill that is in fact adorned with some rather large walnut trees.

Like the present residence the original house commanded a tremendous view of the Greenspring Valley to the Northwest and of all of the Rider properties directly below. The house could be seen as well and it was probably no accident that by the 1870's there were three large and quite fashionable mansard style homes within sight of each other with L. J. Robert's fancied-up house being one of them. Although smooth and light in appearance in the snapshot Mrs. Owings recalls that the old house was of heavy stone construction and that its thick walls had to be blasted The spring house is constructed of brownish gneiss common to this area. By the 1870's the house may have been stuccoed. The Bromley Atlas of 1898 does not show smaller outbuildings such as meathouses, spring houses or privies but it does show the location of barns and stables. This map shows the main house to be L-shaped with north and west wings and two outbuildings spaced at equal distances on a line to the southeast. The fartherst is a barn which Mrs. Owings says is survived only by the ruins of a stone foundation.

Dairy

The dairy is down the hill on the east side of the house and utilizes a spring-fed stream which flows on down to the bottom of the hill. This little structure is made of stone and measures approximately 14 feet (South) by 13 feet (East). It faces the house and is vented in the sides by the slit vents seen in 18th century barns. The front of the building has an entrance which was reached by sunken steps with a well opening and trough like those recorded at Epsom Plantation and Hunt's Meeting House. The back of the building has been vandalized, obliterating either the vent or window that was there.

The building is made of uncoursed stone and is capped by a gable-end roof that is a replacement. The lintel over the entrance and the sills embedded beneath the vents are hewn. The interior was plastered and whitewashed.

A short distance upstream there is a small pond which Mrs. Owings calls the ice pond. It is a visual reminder of the fact that Walnut Hill is a survivor of that period when the Ruxton-Riderwood area was genuinely rural and not a garden suburb.
